People are unemployed longer.

In January 2013, 4.7 million people were chronically unemployed (27 weeks or over), lower than January 2012 (5.5 million).

Some may be doing something else while waiting for the job market to improve.

Self-employment may be a viable alternative for long-term unemployed

- Over time, more people in the U.S. have turned to self-employment as a source of income
  - The long-term trend in the self-employment data has revealed a remarkable labor market phenomenon in the U.S.
  - More and more people seem to be choosing self-employment as an alternative or supplement to formal labor market
  - Surge in self-employment is likely to continue

Self-Employment as an Economic Development Strategy

- Less cyclical than larger firms (Roper and Hewitt-Dundas, 2001)
- Job creation in small firms may be more cost effective than other forms of industrial development assistance (Roper and Hewitt-Dundas, 2001)
- More likely adaptable to changing conditions (less capital intensive)
- Potential tool to alleviate poverty
- Income patching

Ideas for Practice: Help for Self-Employed

- Technical assistance to increase productivity
- Help with business plans and marketing
- Promote general business services
- Provide programs that stimulate the entrepreneurial culture of a community
- Policy change with respect to issues such as healthcare, taxation
- Help with access to capital
Self-Employment Resources

- Self-Employment Assistance (DOL)
- Counseling and Training
  - The SCORE Association: a nonprofit association with volunteer business counselors
  - Small Business Development Centers (SBDCs)
  - The SBA’s Women’s Business Center Program comprises a national network of WBCs providing business training
  - The Veterans Business Outreach Program (VBOP) provides entrepreneurial development services for eligible veterans owning or considering starting a small business.
Micro-business: General Implications for Practice

- Alignment with workforce development efforts and perhaps targeted toward populations facing stubbornly high unemployment
- More recognition of micro-businesses as an income patching strategy for local economies
- Potential to improve farm and nonfarm earnings in rural communities
- Potential to decrease population loss in rural communities
- Potential employment opportunities for women
